Hamilton, of Boston, was the principal speaker, announcing that the Methodist was to-day the strongest church in the world. He said;

Says Methodist Leads,

"I want Methodists to appreciate themselves. Our church, by virtue of its remarkable growth, has been driven into the leadership of matters religious and tains. all matters of importance. We are the leaders, and we cannot help it.
"In the United States to-day there are 8,000,000 Methodists. The Church must stick to its doctrinal exterior, for if it loses that it will surely fall. I say without reservation that if the Methodists of the District of Columbia should stick I together there would not be a saloon within its borders by Saturday night." Following Bishop Hamilton, the junior member of the conference, Bishop E. H. Hughes compared George Washington and John Wesley.

Two Men Compared.

"George Washington and John Wesley were alike in many things," he said. "Both of them married widows. One married a widow with a comfortable fortune, and the other married a widow with an uncomfortable temper. We were present at the birth of the Union, and if the republic ever dies the M. E. WAS DECIDED HIT

The Chamber of Commerce cup was the trophy in this event, and the judges, critical and exacting as they were, had difficulty in picking a winner. The mantle fell on Lieut. Tate's splendid chestnut gelding, Buster Brown, and the victory was well deserved, for horse and rider had worked together in such faultless harmony that their performance was a work of art. Lieut. Johnston's brown gelding, John Harper, was awarded second; Dan Cole, ridden by Lieut, A. R. Chaffee, fr., third, and Corotoman, Col.

Treat's chestnut gelding, fourth. This great competition of the chargers as entirely distinct from the cavalry drill, which was, in its way, an equally brilliant piece of work. The charge across the field was done with such unison and dash that the highest plaudits of the day were bestowed then and there.

There was a little stable boy named "Peewee" Rose who jumped into fame yesterday. He sent the fiery Roustabout, who jumps with the instinct of an ante-lope, over the barrier at six feet eight inches. This breaks Roustabout's former record of six feet six inches, but falls short of the world's record set by Heath-erbloom, which is eight feet and some began to glow faint through the evening haze. Like a gray bug attracted by the glow, the speck buzzed evenly toward the star and blotted it for a moment, and then circled wide into the southeast, still rising, to leave the faint star winking feebly again.

Hoxsey had gone off toward the southeast as Johnstone headed toward him.
On the field below them monoplanes and biplanes, whirring around for the hourly distance prizes, had so little light to guide them that even when they were across the field from the fur-coated folks on the clubhouse lawn it was difficult to distinguish their lines in the dusk, Hoxsey at his height and distance somewhere up in the slaty sky of the southeast was lost to risk allocations in the east was lost to view altogether in the quickening night.

But for a while longer the crowd on he lawns, nervous but happy and the groups near the cross field Wright hangirs, nervous and unhappy, could see ohnstone, a ghost of a mote, as he faded nto the night.

Worried About Them.

"Gosh darn 'em," sighed a form behind he glow of a long cigar, and the voice was the voice of Secretary Barnes, of the Wright Company, who with thoughts for the lives of the aviators and lives of the company's machines, often has had to express the same general idea when Hoxsey and Johnstone are going against each other for supremacy.

"I'd put the rollers under those two ads, if I could only get at them," but e couldn't.

With the coming of darkness, the stars egan to sprinkle the sky with diamonds. On the grand stand side of the field those who remained, and there were many, raised their voices in excited arguments as one assured his neighbor that e could see the stars blotted out where the aeroplanes were coursing aloft in
